

Fighting racism & bigotry

A personal note

Over the last several years I have fought against racism, and campaigned for decency in official immigration programmes and – in doing so – have encountered racism and bigotry time and time again:

During public campaigning, despite having widespread public support, I have sometimes come across bigots who can be ugly in their loathsome demeanor, when they:

- Yell and scream obscenities
- Threaten violence
- Refuse to enter into reasonable discussion (refusing to even talk about differences of views is a common theme – maybe they are scared of seeing the truth of our opinions?)

A hallmark of a true bigot is seen in those who will not consider directly opposing views as valid or who refuse to regard those holding opposing views as decent people. Like the close-minded religious bigotry of the Middle Ages, those who do not agree with these modern bigots find themselves classed as heretics and as beyond redemption. The narrow-mindedness of bigots continues to astound me.

On rare occasions, at public events, bigots have even organised groups of what can reasonably be termed as “thugs”, and have:

- Assaulted old men and women (even assaulted the wheelchair-confined)
- Spat upon people, especially at senior citizens (filthy manners, to say the least)
- Harassed people in their homes
- Tried to stop people from entering meetings

Racism also exists in government circles:

- Discrimination, often slyly disguised, exists in government departments and procedures.
- Official guidelines that appear to be “impartial” but actually result in discrimination.
- Authoritarian laws and deeds have been enacted to quash opposition to government policies

All reasonable people should band together to fight such racists and bigots.

All of the bigotry and racism that I have described has been the work of multiculturalist bigots and anti-White racists. Often found in the ranks of active multiculturalists are bigots whose behaviour seems to be lower than that of mentally-challenged farm animals.

The racism I have seen in government has been anti-White racism and anti-White discrimination, either disguised or legally “justified”. Such racism is justified and upheld by the prevailing education and mass media ethos, which has turned what is known as the “White Guilt Complex” into a common psychosis. The bigotry and racism of multiculturalism evokes memories of the Communism and Nazism that we fought against in the 20th Century. Just because anti-White racism is often a form of self-hatred does not mean that it is acceptable.

Fight against racism and bigotry; fight against multiculturalism.
